This report takes about 10 minutes to read.

We'd encourage you to take that time. The decisions ahead of you—rate type, lender, timing—will impact your finances for years. This document was built specifically for your situation, and it's designed to make sure you understand your options clearly.

Even if you choose not to work with us, you'll walk away more informed than most Canadians ever get about their mortgage.

Markets change. So should your mortgage strategy.

What You Told Us

Sarah, thank you for sharing your story with us. Your mortgage isn't just numbers on a page—it's your home, your family's security, and years of hard work. We take that seriously.

Here's what we heard during our conversation:

- You currently have a $520,000 mortgage with Royal Bank that you locked in at 5.79%
- You originally started with a variable rate at prime minus 0.85% (around 1.45%)
- When rates started climbing in 2022, you panicked and locked into a 5-year fixed
- You've been watching rates drop and feel frustrated that you're stuck at the higher rate
- You're wondering if there's any way to get out of this mortgage without a huge penalty
- Your renewal isn't for another 2.5 years, but you want to understand your options
- You're committed to staying in your home long-term and prioritize stability

We've designed the rest of this report around your specific situation. No generic advice—just a clear-eyed look at what happened on your last term, what it means for you today, and what we can do differently going forward.

Take your time with the following pages. We want you to understand not just what we recommend, but why—so you can make the best decision for your family.

What Happened on Your Last Term

In 2021 or early 2022, you were in a variable rate mortgage—probably somewhere around 1.45%. It was even lower than fixed at the time. Smart move.

Then rates started climbing. And climbing. By late 2022, your rate had crossed 4%. By 2023, it was pushing toward 6%. Your payments were increasing with every Bank of Canada announcement, and the news was relentless—more hikes coming, inflation out of control, no end in sight.

At some point—probably when your rate hit 5.79%—you called your bank and locked in. Three-year fixed. Maybe five. You needed the bleeding to stop.

That decision felt right. But here's what it cost you.

ESTIMATED COST OF THIS SEQUENCE

$38,675

in extra interest over your term

By the time you locked in, you'd already paid thousands in extra interest during the climb. Then you locked into a rate that was 1.5-2% higher than where rates eventually settled.

Meanwhile, rates started falling. Fixed rates dropped into the low 4s. But you were stuck at 5.79%. Still paying hundreds more per month than you needed to. For years.

This wasn't your fault.

You weren't a mortgage expert—you shouldn't have to be. But the person who was supposed to be watching your mortgage wasn't watching. No one called you at 3.5% to say "consider locking in now before it gets worse." No one reached out when rates started falling to discuss whether breaking and relocking made sense. You were left to react alone, under stress, with incomplete information.

What could happen again:

You're about to make another multi-year commitment. If rates drop after you lock in—and no one is watching—you'll miss the window again. If you take variable and rates spike again—and no one calls you—you'll ride it up just like last time.

The pattern only breaks if someone is actually paying attention. That's what we do.

Our Promise to You

$5,000

PENALTY GUARANTEE

If your penalty exceeds $5,000 when refinancing with us, we cover the difference. Guaranteed.

For penalties under $5,000, we split it 50/50.

How It Works

- Your penalty is $12,000? You pay $5,000, we cover $7,000.
- Your penalty is $8,000? You pay $5,000, we cover $3,000.
- Your penalty is $4,500? We split it 50/50—you pay $2,250, we cover $2,250.

This guarantee exists because we believe in our ability to find you a better deal. If the savings from your new rate don't justify the penalty, we make up the difference.

Ask Your Bank

Ask your bank: "If I renew with you, will you guarantee that I will not pay any higher of a penalty than $5,000? And if the penalty is lower than $5,000, will you split it with me 50/50—for any reason I break the mortgage, including selling my house?"

If they say no, then the risk of renewing with them is way too high. You will not have an opportunity to renegotiate and get a lower rate in the future.

Strategy: Fixed Rate Mortgage

A fixed rate locks in your interest rate for the entire term—typically 5 years. Your payment stays exactly the same, no matter what happens in the market.

When Fixed Makes Sense

- You value predictability and want to know exactly what you'll pay each month
- Your budget is tight and you can't absorb payment increases
- You believe rates will rise significantly during your term
- You sleep better knowing your rate won't change

What We Do Differently

Most people just take the rate their bank offers. We make lenders compete—and the difference can be significant.

But here's the thing: getting you a competitive rate today is just the beginning. The real value happens during your term.

Monthly Mortgage Monitoring

Every month, we send you a customized report that analyzes your fixed rate relative to current market rates. You'll always know exactly where you stand.

Why this matters: Let's say you lock in today at 4.30%. Fourteen months from now, the same 5-year fixed rate is available at 3.75%. Your bank will never tell you this. They're happy to keep collecting your higher payments.

We'll notify you immediately. And because of our $5,000 Penalty Guarantee (with 50/50 split on penalties under $5,000), you can actually do something about it.

Strategic Relock: How It Works

When rates drop significantly, we run the math:

- What's your current penalty?
- What will you save with the lower rate?
- Does it make sense to break and relock?

If the savings outweigh the penalty—and with our guarantee protecting you—we execute a strategic relock. You get a brand new 5-year term at the lower rate, and you keep more money in your pocket.

Real Example: Two Strategic Relocks in One Term

Let's compare two borrowers with identical $500,000 mortgages, both starting at 4.30%:

BORROWER A: RENEWS WITH THEIR BANK

- Locks in at 4.30% for 5 years
- Rates drop to 3.75% at month 14—bank never calls
- Rates drop to 3.25% at month 32—bank still never calls
- Pays 4.30% for the entire 60 months
- Total interest paid over 5 years: approximately $103,500

BORROWER B: WORKS WITH INSPIRED MORTGAGE

- Locks in at 4.30%
- Month 14: Rates drop to 3.75%. We call. Penalty is $4,200—we split it 50/50 ($2,100 each). Relock at 3.75% for new 5-year term.
- Month 32 (18 months into new term): Rates drop to 3.25%. We call again. Penalty is $3,800—we split it 50/50 ($1,900 each). Relock at 3.25%.
- Total penalties paid by borrower: $4,000
- Total interest paid: approximately $78,200

THE DIFFERENCE

Borrower B saves over $21,000 in interest, minus $4,000 in penalties = net savings of $17,000+

And here's what most people miss: Borrower B also now has a rate locked at 3.25% going forward, while Borrower A is about to renew into whatever the market offers in year 6.

This is active management. This is what your bank will never do.

Ask Your Bank

Before you renew with them, ask: "If rates drop significantly during my term, will you call me? Will you help me relock at the lower rate? Will you guarantee my penalty won't exceed $5,000?"

You already know the answer.

Strategy: Variable Rate Mortgage

Variable rates move with the market—which means risk, but also opportunity. Right now, based on our analysis, we're in a cycle that looks flat to slightly declining. That's a window.

But here's what you need to understand: a variable rate is only as good as the management behind it.

When Variable Makes Sense

- You can handle some payment fluctuation
- You believe rates will stay flat or decrease
- You want lower penalties if you need to break your mortgage early
- Historically, variable rates have outperformed fixed rates over time

What We Do Differently

We don't guess at market timing. We track the signals that matter—Bank of Canada policy, bond yields, inflation trends, employment data, and how lenders are pricing risk. We've mapped these cycles for years. When the indicators shift, we act.

The Strategy

Start variable, benefit from lower payments while rates drift down, and watch for the signals that tell us we're approaching the bottom of the cycle. When those signals appear, we reach out to discuss locking into a fixed rate—ideally 1–1.5% below today's rates.

How This Could Play Out For You

You start variable at today's rates. Over the next 12–18 months, the Bank of Canada continues easing. Your rate drops incrementally. When we see signs the cycle is turning—inflation ticking up, bond yields rising—we reach out. You lock in at the bottom, a full 1–1.5% below today's fixed rates. That's active management in action.

On your $520,000 mortgage, a 1.25% rate drop saves you roughly $6,500 per year—and over $32,500 across a typical term. That's not a rounding error. That's a family vacation every year. Or years shaved off your amortization. Or tens of thousands in interest you never pay.

The Danger of Going It Alone

In 2022 and 2023, we saw what happens when no one is watching.

Variable rates spiked. Homeowners who had chosen variable—often on good advice at the time—watched their rates climb month after month. But here's what made it worse: most banks kept their payments the same.

That sounds harmless. It wasn't.

What actually happened is that a larger and larger portion of each payment went to interest—and almost nothing went to principal. Some homeowners made payments for two full years and barely moved the needle on what they owed. They had no warning. No call from their bank. No one watching.

By the time they realized what had happened, the damage was done—tens of thousands in extra interest, years added to their mortgage, and no easy way out.

That's what unmanaged variable looks like.

Managed variable means someone is watching. Someone runs the numbers monthly. Someone calls when the math changes. Someone tells you when it's time to lock in—and when it's time to wait.

That's what we do.

And if the time comes to lock in and there's a penalty involved—even on a variable rate mortgage—you're protected by our $5,000 Mortgage Penalty Guarantee. Your out-of-pocket will never exceed $5,000 (and if the penalty is under $5,000, we split it 50/50). We cover the rest.

That's not a promise you'll find anywhere else.
